

Theory suggests tariffs hurt consumers but may help domestic suppliers

With a given imported good, consumers are benefiting from low costs and high quantity. When tariffs push up the outside price, quantity goes down and prices go up, hurting consumers while providing relatively little benefit to domestic businesses.

Credit where credit is due: Andrew Heiss for his relevant methodology